

Introduction to the Special Series on Gambling Disorder

March 1, 2019

Here at The BASIS, we have a tradition of dedicating every March to the topic of Gambling Disorder. Our focus coincides with Problem Gambling Awareness Month, an initiative of the National Council on Problem Gambling designed to raise awareness of prevention, treatment, and recovery services.

First, Dr. Debi LaPlante of the Division on Addiction will preview this year's Gambling Disorder Screening Day, a grassroots initiative to promote screening and early detection among people who might be at-risk for gambling-related problems. Since we launched this initiative six years ago, healthcare providers across the United States and beyond have begun screening their clients for gambling-related problems. Screening Day is on Tuesday, March 12th, and providers who are interested in screening their clients can find a free toolkit with all necessary information here.

All through the month, we will review recently published scientific articles related to Gambling Disorder. The DRAM will review a study of commercials for online sports betting and how alcohol consumption is depicted in these ads. ASHES will explore whether people who are dependent on tobacco can achieve gambling abstinence at the same rate as those who do not use tobacco. STASH will review a study of gambling-related problems and stimulant use among adolescents. Finally, The WAGER will describe a study of gambling problems among poker players and how those problems change over time. Together, these science reviews illustrate the diversity and quality of current research on Gambling Disorder.

Nothing illustrates the experience of Gambling Disorder better than the personal stories of those affected by it. During the second week of this Special Series, we will present an op-ed written by the daughter of a man who struggled with gambling-related problems. Hers is a story of loss but also of recovery and reconciliation.

We hope you will enjoy and learn from this Special Series.
