

No Time Like The Present: The BASIS Special Series on Race and Addiction

June 2, 2020

On May 25th, 2020,

the dual public health threats of the COVID-19 pandemic and racism collided in the United States. Since then, activists, academics, politicians, government representatives, and citizens have supported essential steps toward anti-racism while navigating the ongoing pandemic. In brief, anti-racism refers to engaging in purposeful efforts to oppose racism, especially those efforts that might change racist policies and ideas. One pathway to anti-racism is dedicating research programs to better understand the psychology of racism in all its contexts. We are privileged to have The BASIS as a worldwide platform for our thoughts and to highlight important research that clarifies the devastating impacts of racism. Because there is no time like the present to start anti-racism work, this month The BASIS will feature a special series on race and addiction, addressing addiction-related discrimination, social determinants of health, health equity, and race.

The BASIS previously has amplified research about race and addiction. In prior special series, we have highlighted disparities in the experience and treatment of addiction and addiction and recovery among tribal communities. Other standalone research reviews have addressed, for example, marijuana use among Latino youth, barriers to treatment for substance use problems, and racial disparities in opioid addiction treatment. Notable editorials have included thought pieces related to the role of health equity in addiction treatment and engagement and empowerment in addiction-related public health. But, there is more to do.

To bring additional attention to race, discrimination, and addiction, our special series begins with ASHES, and reviews research indicating that when providing outpatient psychiatric care, physicians are less likely to screen Black patients for cigarette smoking than White patients—despite increased need for this screening among Black patients. Other research reviews include an issue of STASH that discusses overdose prevention among a mostly Black/Hispanic sample of people who have been released from incarceration, a WAGER that describes patterns of gambling initiation among African American and White teens, and a DRAM that summarizes research about racial discrimination as a stressor that may put African Americans at risk for alcohol use and related problems.

We supplement these research reviews with editorials from our Division on Addiction team members, Ms. Vanessa Graham and Ms. Karen Amichia, and editorials from experts on this issue from outside the Division, Ms. Margaret Knapp and Dr. Sarah Matsuzaka, and Mr. Malakai Hart and Dr. Carl Hart.

Welcome to our special series on Race and Addiction.
