The DRAM, Vol. 21(3) - The role of social validation from significant others in achieving and maintaining sobriety

March 25, 2025

Editor's note: Today's review is part of our month-long Special Series on Addiction and Social Support. Throughout March, the BASIS is highlighting the role of social support in addiction-related experiences.

Social identity change is an integral part of addiction recovery. Recovering persons often adopt a new 'sober identity,' becoming a member of a social group whose values and behaviors revolve around recovery (as opposed to substance use). Social relationships that promote this identity shift may be important for achieving and maintaining sobriety. This week, as part of our Special Series on Addiction and Social Support, The DRAM reviews a study by Gary Westwell and colleagues that investigated the role of social validation from significant others in achieving and maintaining sobriety among people in recovery from alcohol misuse.

What were the research questions?

(1) What factors and experiences relate to achieving and maintaining sobriety among people in recovery from alcohol misuse? (2) What are recovering persons' perspectives on and experiences with social validation from their significant others?

What did the researchers do?

The researchers recruited 18 people from alcohol peer support groups in northern England. All participants had been in sobriety for at least one year after experiencing problems with their drinking for at least five years. The researchers interviewed the participants about their experiences achieving and maintaining sobriety, and then thematically analyzed the responses. One subtheme that emerged was the role of family and friends in maintaining change. The authors of this paper focus on one aspect of this subtheme – validation of the new 'sober me' from significant others (e.g., family, friends).

What did they find?

Three-quarters of participants organically mentioned instances where their new sober identity had been either validated or invalidated by significant others. In general, many participants expressed an overall desire for validation and acceptance (see Figure). Participants who had experienced validation felt as though they were being taken seriously, that they were trusted, and felt accepted and believed in. For many, validation helped them maintain their sobriety. On the other hand, some participants experienced resistance from significant others who didn't acknowledge their new identity and continued to treat them like their 'old self.' For some, this invalidation made their recovery more challenging.

Social validation of one's new sober identity: Perspectives of people in recovery from alcohol misuse

Desire for acceptance & validation

"It's a pity I don't have somebody close to me at times because I miss getting any kind of praise for doing well... Acknowledgement that I have changed how I am, and I have improved. It's hard work just relying on your own thoughts all the time."

"...My cousin couldn't move on, even after four years had passed, she still thought I might go for another drink given the opportunity. I have resigned myself to the idea that some people won't accept the change in me and probably won't even in twenty years."

Acceptance & validation of identity change

"But others are great and accept what has happened and most importantly accept that I have changed... My daughter and my niece have a much more trusting relationship with me... I felt like a whole person again and it spurred me on to remain sober."

"I have had the benefit of my family around me ever since... They have whole-heartedly accepted what I am - an alcoholic who is reformed, if you like, in so far as I have completely stopped drinking and turned my life around..."

Resistance from significant others

"Well, I was hindered at times because when I went out from work, I was the one who people told me they were banking on to give them a good time. They relied on me to be the life and soul of the party... Some people were quite disappointed when they met me on a night out and I wasn't what they expected anymore..."

Figure. The perspectives of people in recovery from alcohol misuse on social validation of their new sober identity from their significant others. Quotes from participants cover experiences with validation and invalidation of their new identity, and the desire for acceptance. Click image to enlarge.

Why do these findings matter?

It is well-documented that social support plays a crucial role in addiction recovery. This study enhances our understanding of one aspect of social support—acceptance and validation of the recovering person's new sober identity by their significant others. These findings suggest that this validation is important to people in recovery and may help them maintain sobriety. Techniques that help significant others build acceptance, like role-play exercises to practice validation behaviors, may be important. Significant others may benefit from taking the Responsibility without Blame course, which can help them recognize and change their attitudes and behaviors towards their loved one in recovery.

Every study has limitations. What are the limitations of this study?

Study participants were in long-term sobriety. These findings might not be generalizable to people who have not achieved or maintained sobriety. All study participants maintained sobriety, even though many experienced instances of invalidation. Future studies should examine the nuances of validation and whether it plays a causal role in maintaining addiction recovery.

For more information:

The National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism has tips and resources for people looking to change their relationship with alcohol. For additional drinking self-help tools, please visit our Addiction Resources page.

— Kira Landauer, MPH

Want CE credit for reading BASIS articles? Click here to visit our Courses Website and access our free online courses.